MSBL / MABL World Series Spotlight on Randy Enns (Komox Canucks)

It's not too difficult to appreciate October weather in Arizona when you call Canada home. Randy Enns is making his tenth trip to the World Series since joining his league in 2001. His Komox Canucks teammates recognize the 20-30 hours each month he devotes to leadership, making things go smoothly for his team and his league. With wife Melody and 15 year old Montan to share his love for baseball, Randy enjoys the competition on the diamond as a break from his job in commercial insurance. Asked what his favorite memory at the World Series has been, he says there are too many to select just one. But Randy points out that the many friendships and significant life changes he has experienced since joining MSBL are his greatest source of pride.

Unknowingly Violated Central Division Rules With 2 Former Professional Players
By Tom Prendergast

In the movie, "A League Of Our Own", Tom Hanks delivers a great line when he tells his players, "there's no crying in baseball!" Truer words were never spoken. Along those lines I would like to add, "There are no secrets at the MSBL World Series!". To date we have had at least 8 official protests regarding suspected illegal players, or non-compliance of Central Division participation rules. I certainly realize what a challenge it is to put together a group of guys and come down here for a week to compete against your peers. Asking for money, trying to meet deadlines, paperwork that never seems to get collected and then dealing with last minute cancellations are all part of a thankless job. But, since everybody has to do it, we are all playing with the same set of rules. Not reading them properly, or at all, is not an excuse for being in violation of the rules. It is usually not the WS staff that makes the discovery when a team is not in compliance, it's one of your opponents, former teammates or even disgruntled players who feel the need to release themselves of this knowledge. In fact, sometimes it's the illegal player himself, informing the other team that he's only a year removed from the pro's and he really enjoys participating in this event. This information can quickly turn a loss into a win for a team that is in compliance and (continued on page 2) playing by the rules. This year the National MSBL / MABL office sent out the tournament rules in May, posted them on the website, and additionally issued the same information to the managers in the booklet they received at team registration. But for teams that have been coming here for many years, most of these rules were well known. If you select to participate in a Central Division, you must bat a minimum number of players per game. That's the prime directive for teams in this division. And while having a former ex professional player on the roster may seem like a great advantage, it could actually put your team in violation if you are in a division which limits or even prohibits former pros. It's safe to say I'm usually the last person to find out about these infractions. But when it's brought to my attention that a team is in violation of these rules, then it's my job to act and uphold the written rules, that have been published and put forth by the National MSBL / MABL office.

It's not personal, simply professional. When the office receives a protest call, we go to "red alert" status. A top priority of the WS staff is to make sure that every team gets a fair shot. We don't take sides and we don't rush to judgment, we just uphold the rules and regulations of the MSBL / MABL World Series tournament. So yesterday when we received the call about the 55+ Central Division Charlie Rose team having more than one ex-professional player, we investigated the issue and determined that they did indeed have two (they are only allowed 1). During the investigation it became apparent to me that other teams were aware of this but felt it was in their best interests to not say anything, just in case they were going to play them later in the playoffs. Because so many teams seemed to be aware of this information, it was assumed that the WS staff and the National MSBL / MABL office were also aware and that we were allowing this to take place. Nothing could be further from reality.

The perception that the more players a team brings to the tournament (which equals more money paid) the more clout they have is false. Every team that participates gets the same fair treatment, and no team gets special conduct from the umpires or staff while they are here. This tournament would not be what it is today with that kind of tolerance. It's my belief that every team and every individual player is given the benefit of the doubt when an accusation arises. We don't take information that is posted on social networking sites necessarily as the truth. The sources we use are usually government related or affiliated in some way with Major League Baseball. Anything less would be a disservice to everyone involved.
